Induction:

The company has developed an organisational structure to meet the requirements of its activities, developed roles within that structure and assigned duties and responsibilities to those roles. Each role has been assessed and a model induction and training plan developed to ensure that individuals employed to carry out a specific role have the necessary skills, knowledge, attitudes and understanding to carry out their role competently and effectively. When an employee first begins working for the company, the model induction and training plan for their job role is used as the basis for producing an individual induction and training plan. Both model and individual induction and training plans are reviewed regularly under company policy to identify requirements for either new, additional or refresher training, in addition to which, the company would also respond to any training needs identified in between reviews, e.g. an employee using work equipment incorrectly. Training is delivered via a variety of training methods, e.g. training courses, demonstrations, tool box talks, etc, using both internal and external resources depending on individual employee requirements and / or the nature of the training.

Induction Process:

New employees will be provided with appropriate initial information and training in their specific job functions and skills. Induction training will include [but not restricted to] Office Safety, Manual Handling, PPE Requirements, Safety at Height Awareness, Slip Trip Fall and Safety Harness Pre-Use Checks. Full details of induction training will be issued by the appropriate Divisional Directors and the Group Health & Safety Director, all training received will be recorded on personnel files.

Training will also be given on customer care and service skills along with specific training relating to the individual's new role. This may include specialist personal track safety training when working within the Network Rail infrastructure. The NR_L2_CTM_021[4] Competence and Training in Track Safety standard sets out the requirements for a management system that ensures people involved in work or provision of services that may affect the operational safety and/or performance of Network Rail controlled infrastructure, are competent to perform the work.
